The Moose at the Museum.

The large moose which has been a feature of the Museum for the past five years, has changed his quarters and is now to be found at the extreme south end of the nave, encased in glass. His surroundings here are such as he would choose during the summer and early fall.

The sphagnum moss which is to be found in most northern swamps, covers the ground, in some places green, in others gray and brown. In the foreground a small balsam fir is growing, and usnea lichen or Spanish moss, as it is commonly called, hangs from its upper branches. The lower limbs have died and fallen off, for the thick growth of underbrush in the swamps prevents a symmetrical development of any tree.

Behind the moose is a young white birch, and this also has branches and leaves on the upper part of the trunk. The bark is ragged and torn, indicating that animals have brushed roughly against it, and that the limbs of other trees have injured it. A small clump of larch trees, which are the most characteristic of the swamp growths, stands near the birch. These have died, their leaves have fallen, and moss and lichens are making them things of beauty. A redstart nest has been found among them, using the lichens from the branches to cover the outside of her nest and render it almost indistinguishable to prying eyes. Beside the moose is an old log, nearly covered with the green mossy growth which is especially partial to fallen trees. A clump of pitcher plants, not yet in bloom, is nearby, and the brightest touch in this swamp scene is the bunch of cotton grass in full flower. Some of these feathery balls are so heavy that they have broken their slender stems and are lying on the ground, while others are stiff and flaunt their brightness in the swamp, where nearly all living things are subdued in coloring.

These accessories of the moose were designed and executed by W. E. Balch of Lyndonville, who has had charge of all the mounting and taxidermy in the Museum.
